What about something like this for one of our questions:

–How would you summarize attitudes about Web 2.0 and social media in academia, as indicated by the survey results (written better than this, of course)?

Or maybe what are the challenges, as indicated by the survey, of the use of Web 2.0 in academia?

Both good areas

We might try to (briefly) describe what we mean by agency, specifically within the context of academia.

I like exploring challenges to Web 2.0 use--that's pretty key for us.

Also, I know we'd talked in the MOO about discussing the limitations or problems with the survey--that'll be a good topic for us.

Yes, I like the idea of how we would describe a rhetoric of personal agency given our experiences in this process and with the survey outcomes

Good stuff! I'm seeing four questions, then, each of which could be prefaced with the following: "Based on your own experiences during this project as well as your analysis of survey results,"

1. Describe "agency" within the context of "Academia 2.0."
2. What are some challenges to incorporating web 2.0 in academia?
3. What problems or limitations do you see to the survey we conducted?
4. What suggestions do you have for future studies?

Oops. I left out the sacred "R" word. We could incorporate it into item 1, above, or we could circle back--reITERATE--and ask ourselves to define "rhetoric of personal agency" as a final question to tie it all together.

Yes, no? This will ROCK!

I like the four questions you've come up with Ronda. Thanks for summarizing. I think we could add a fifth question specifically about a rhetoric of personal agency, but maybe we don't need it since that's what we're doing in the tier-2 posts and it's really more specific to the class discussion vs. the academic website. Could go either way I suppose.

I think these questions look good for the purposes of our discussion. Thanks for summarizing Ronda and sorry I did not participate in this exchange more. I think we would be good with those four and that the conversation may trickle into rhetoric of personal agency just by the nature of what we have done.

I agree, Kristi.

In the words of Patrick Swayze:

Ditto.
